Hana's New Kite

On a windy spring afternoon, Hana took her new red kite to the park. Grandpa sat on a bench nearby. The kite rose high above the grass.

Then a strong gust of wind pushed it sideways. The kite crashed into the top of a tall tree and stuck there. Hana's lip trembled. "My new kite!" she cried.

Grandpa came over and looked up. "Pulling hard might rip it," he said. "Let's think first."

Hana walked all the way around the tree. On the far side, the branches were thinner. She stood there and gave the string small, gentle tugs. Slowly, the kite slid between two branches. It floated down with only one small tear.

Grandpa pulled tape from his pocket, and they patched the tear together. Hana grinned. "Next time, I will fly it far from the trees," she said.
