The Deep End

On a hot July afternoon, Jonah stood at the edge of the town pool. Today was his swim test. To pass, he had to swim all the way across the deep end. Then he could ride the big slide with his cousin Luis.

Jonah looked down at the dark blue water. His legs felt like jelly, and he took a step back. "Maybe next summer," he whispered.

The lifeguard, Mrs. Chen, knelt beside him. "You can stop at the rope halfway and rest," she said. "I will walk right beside you along the edge."

Jonah thought about the slide. He thought about all his practice in the shallow end, where his feet could touch the bottom. He pinched his nose, counted to three, and slid into the water.

He kicked hard and reached with long strokes. At the rope, he grabbed on and caught his breath. Then he pushed off again and touched the far wall.

Luis cheered from the side of the pool. Mrs. Chen handed Jonah a blue wristband that showed he had passed. Jonah grinned so wide his cheeks hurt. That afternoon, he went down the big slide eleven times.
