Before the Sun Came Up

Amara's alarm buzzed while the sky was still dark. She switched it off fast and listened. The house was quiet. She slipped out of bed and tiptoed past her parents' door.

In the kitchen, she set out a bowl, flour, sugar, and eggs. She followed a recipe card in Grandma's neat handwriting. Twice she dropped a spoon. Each time, she froze and held her breath. Nobody woke up.

An hour later, the kitchen smelled warm and sweet. Amara wiped flour off the counter with a damp towel. She stuck a yellow note on the oven door. It said, "Do NOT open! From A." She drew a little heart under her name.

At seven o'clock, Dad shuffled into the kitchen, rubbing his eyes. He sniffed the air and raised his eyebrows. Then he saw the note and grinned. On the calendar by the fridge, today's box had a balloon drawn in it.

"I wonder what this could be," Dad said, winking at Amara. Amara pressed her lips together and said nothing.
