The Gray Wall on Maple Street

For three Saturdays in a row, Andre's big brother, Jalen, left the house before breakfast. He carried an old backpack that clinked when he walked. Each afternoon he came home tired, with blue and yellow spots on his sneakers.

"Where do you go?" Andre asked on the third Saturday.

"Just out," Jalen said. He grabbed an apple from the bowl and hurried upstairs. A moment later, Andre heard the bathroom tap running for a long time.

Andre decided to look for clues. In the garage, he found three empty cans lined up on a shelf. Each one had a drippy blue or yellow stripe down its side. In the recycling bin, he found a crumpled flyer. It showed the gray wall behind the Maple Street library. Across the top, big letters said "Help Us Brighten Our Block!"

Andre also remembered something Mom had said at dinner. Their little sister, Nia, had been sad for weeks. Her favorite park bench had been taken away. "She sat there every day after story time," Mom had said. "She loved watching the ducks on the pond."

On Sunday morning, Jalen knocked on Andre's door. "Want to come for a walk?" he asked. "Bring Nia. And don't tell her where we're going."

The three of them walked to Maple Street. When they turned the corner, Andre stopped. The gray library wall was gone. In its place was a painted pond, bright blue and wide. Yellow ducks floated across it. Painted cattails swayed at the edges. In front of the wall, a new wooden bench faced the painting.

Nia ran to the bench and climbed on. Then she pointed at one duck near the corner. It wore a tiny pink bow, just like the one on her favorite hat.

Jalen pretended to study the sky. But Andre noticed he was smiling so wide that his ears moved.

1. Where was Jalen most likely going on Saturdays?
   - to work at the library desk
   - to the pond to watch the ducks
