The Quiet Morning

Kofi opened his eyes and blinked. His bedroom was strangely bright, even though the clock said six-thirty. Usually the street below his window was full of noise. Buses rumbled, and car doors slammed. This morning, he heard nothing at all.

He pulled on his robe and padded downstairs. Dad stood at the back door in his tall rubber boots. A shovel leaned against the wall, and a puddle was spreading under it. Dad's cheeks were bright red. He blew on his fingers to warm them.

"Morning, Kofi," Dad said. "The driveway took me an hour."

In the kitchen, Mom was talking on the phone. "Yes, I saw the message," she said. "The whole district? Okay, thanks for calling." She hung up and smiled at Kofi. "You won't need your backpack today."

Kofi let out a whoop. He raced to the hall closet and dug through a basket. He tossed aside his sneakers and his baseball cap. At the bottom, he found his mittens, his wool hat, and the sled rope.

His little sister, Ama, wandered in and rubbed her eyes. "Why is everyone so happy?" she asked. Kofi pointed at the window. Ama pressed her nose to the glass and squealed.
