Reading Fluency Review

Grade 3 Reading Worksheet - Challenge Me

Name _____ Date _____

Circle the answer.

READ THIS FIRST

The Bake Sale Mix-Up

The third-grade bake sale started at noon, and Ellie's table was almost ready. She stacked the blueberry muffins in neat rows and covered them with a clean cloth so they would stay fresh. Her friend Marcus taped up the price list and read it out loud.

"Muffins, one dollar each. Lemon bars, two for a doll..." Marcus stopped. "Wait — two for a doll? That doesn't make sense." He read the line again. "Two for a dollar. Okay, that's better."

Then Ellie gasped. "Oh no! Where are the lemon bars? Mom baked two dozen last night!"

Marcus looked under the table. He looked inside the cooler. "They're not here," he said. "Maybe they're still in your mom's car?"

Ellie hurried to the parking lot. Her mom was standing beside the car, holding a tray. "Looking for these?" she asked with a wink.

"Mom, you're amazing!" Ellie cried.

By twelve o'clock, a long line had formed. Mr. Tanaka, the principal, bought three muffins. "I'll take one for me, one for Ms. Bell, and one for... well, maybe I'll eat two," he said. Everyone laughed. Next came a group of fourth graders, then two teachers, and then a dad pushing a stroller with twin babies inside.

The lemon bars sold out first, and Marcus had to keep making change from the money box. Then the muffins disappeared, one by one. Soon, only a single muffin was left on the plate.

A small boy stepped up to the table. He counted his coins carefully — a quarter, another quarter, and two dimes. "I only have seventy cents," he whispered. "Is that enough?"

Ellie looked at Marcus. Marcus looked at Ellie. Then Ellie smiled. "Today," she said, "it's exactly enough."

Later, they counted the money twice to be sure. The class had raised enough for twelve new library books. "Next year," Marcus said, "let's bake twice as many muffins!" Ellie laughed and wrote his idea on the back of the price list.

1. Marcus first read "two for a doll." What made him go back and reread?
   - Mr. Tanaka asked him to read it again.
   - Ellie told him he read it wrong.
   - The list was too small to see.
   - The words did not make sense for a price.

2. In "one for... well, maybe I'll eat two," what do the three dots tell the reader?
   - Read faster, like he is in a big hurry.
   - Pause, like Mr. Tanaka is changing his mind.
   - Raise your voice, like he is asking something.
   - Stop and start the whole line over.

3. Where should a reader pause in this sentence?
   - He counted his / coins carefully — a / quarter, another quarter, and / two dimes.
   - He counted his coins carefully — / a quarter, / another quarter, / and two dimes.
   - He / counted his coins / carefully — a quarter, another / quarter, and two dimes.
   - He counted his coins / carefully — a quarter, another quarter, and two / dimes.

4. "I only have seventy cents," he whispered. How should a reader say the boy's words?
   fast and bossy, like an order
   quiet and shy, a little unsure
   flat and bored, like a list
   loud and proud, like a cheer

5. Which word should get the most stress in "let's bake twice as many muffins!"?
   many twice bake let's

6. Where might a reader slow down to show a quiet, kind moment?
   when the lemon bars sell out first
   when the boy asks if his coins are enough
   when Mr. Tanaka buys three muffins
   when Marcus looks under the table

7. How should a reader read "Ellie looked at Marcus. Marcus looked at Ellie."?
   as one long sentence with no stop at all
   loudly, as if the two friends are arguing
   very fast, as if nothing important happens
   with short pauses, as they decide without words

8. How can a reader break disappeared into parts?
   dis-appe-ared dis-ap-peared di-sapp-eared disa-ppe-ared

9. How should Ellie's voice change in "Oh no! Where are the lemon bars?"
   slow and sleepy, then loud at the very end
   calm and flat for both of the sentences
   worried and sharp, then rising for the question
   cheerful, then dropping quietly at the end

10. Reread the part about the last muffin. Why did Ellie say "it's exactly enough"?
    Marcus said the price was seventy cents.
    The boy had one whole dollar in coins.
    She chose to sell him the muffin for less.
    She wanted to keep the last muffin.

Scan to get this marked free. No screen time for your child.
Print it · do it in pencil · scan it · PencilGo picks the next sheet.

Reading Fluency Review

Answer Key - Grade 3 Reading Worksheet - Challenge Me

Circle the answer.

READ THIS FIRST

The Bake Sale Mix-Up

The third-grade bake sale started at noon, and Ellie's table was almost ready. She stacked the blueberry muffins in neat rows and covered them with a clean cloth so they would stay fresh. Her friend Marcus taped up the price list and read it out loud.

"Muffins, one dollar each. Lemon bars, two for a doll..." Marcus stopped. "Wait — two for a doll? That doesn't make sense." He read the line again. "Two for a dollar. Okay, that's better."

Then Ellie gasped. "Oh no! Where are the lemon bars? Mom baked two dozen last night!"

Marcus looked under the table. He looked inside the cooler. "They're not here," he said. "Maybe they're still in your mom's car?"

Ellie hurried to the parking lot. Her mom was standing beside the car, holding a tray. "Looking for these?" she asked with a wink.

"Mom, you're amazing!" Ellie cried.

By twelve o'clock, a long line had formed. Mr. Tanaka, the principal, bought three muffins. "I'll take one for me, one for Ms. Bell, and one for... well, maybe I'll eat two," he said. Everyone laughed. Next came a group of fourth graders, then two teachers, and then a dad pushing a stroller with twin babies inside.

The lemon bars sold out first, and Marcus had to keep making change from the money box. Then the muffins disappeared, one by one. Soon, only a single muffin was left on the plate.

A small boy stepped up to the table. He counted his coins carefully — a quarter, another quarter, and two dimes. "I only have seventy cents," he whispered. "Is that enough?"

Ellie looked at Marcus. Marcus looked at Ellie. Then Ellie smiled. "Today," she said, "it's exactly enough."

Later, they counted the money twice to be sure. The class had raised enough for twelve new library books. "Next year," Marcus said, "let's bake twice as many muffins!" Ellie laughed and wrote his idea on the back of the price list.

1. Marcus first read "two for a doll." What made him go back and reread?
   - Mr. Tanaka asked him to read it again.
   - Ellie told him he read it wrong.
   - The list was too small to see.
   - The words did not make sense for a price.

2. In "one for... well, maybe I'll eat two," what do the three dots tell the reader?
   - Read faster, like he is in a big hurry.
   - Pause, like Mr. Tanaka is changing his mind.
   - Raise your voice, like he is asking something.
   - Stop and start the whole line over.

3. Where should a reader pause in this sentence?
   - He counted his / coins carefully — a / quarter, another quarter, and / two dimes.
   - He counted his coins carefully — / a quarter, / another quarter, / and two dimes.
   - He / counted his coins / carefully — a quarter, another / quarter, and two dimes.
   - He counted his coins / carefully — a quarter, another quarter, and two / dimes.

4. "I only have seventy cents," he whispered. How should a reader say the boy's words?
fast and bossy, like an order
quiet and shy, a little unsure
flat and bored, like a list
loud and proud, like a cheer

5. Which word should get the most stress in "let's bake twice as many muffins!"?
many twice bake let's

6. Where might a reader slow down to show a quiet, kind moment?
when the lemon bars sell out first
when the boy asks if his coins are enough
when Mr. Tanaka buys three muffins
when Marcus looks under the table

7. How should a reader read "Ellie looked at Marcus. Marcus looked at Ellie."?
as one long sentence with no stop at all
loudly, as if the two friends are arguing
very fast, as if nothing important happens
with short pauses, as they decide without words

8. How can a reader break disappeared into parts?
dis-appe-ared dis-ap-peared di-sapp-eared disa-ppe-ared

9. How should Ellie's voice change in "Oh no! Where are the lemon bars?"
slow and sleepy, then loud at the very end
calm and flat for both of the sentences
worried and sharp, then rising for the question
cheerful, then dropping quietly at the end

10. Reread the part about the last muffin. Why did Ellie say "it's exactly enough"?
Marcus said the price was seventy cents.
The boy had one whole dollar in coins.
She chose to sell him the muffin for less.
She wanted to keep the last muffin.