Two Tickets to Pine Hollow

Tobias and his little sister Ines were riding the train to Grandmother's house. It was the first time their parents had let them travel alone. Mom had put Tobias in charge of both tickets. "Keep them safe," she said, "and look after your sister."

The train rumbled out of the city station at nine o'clock. Ines pressed her nose to the window. Green fields rolled past as the train picked up speed. She pointed at cows, barns, and a red tractor. Tobias read his comic book, but every few minutes he patted his jacket pocket. The tickets were still there.

Around ten o'clock, Ines needed to use the restroom at the end of the car. Tobias walked her there and waited by the door. When they came back, he patted his pocket again. It was empty!

Tobias's stomach did a flip. The conductor would be checking tickets soon. He wanted to panic, but he made himself stop and think. Where had he been? He had only walked to the restroom and back.

Tobias and Ines searched slowly down the aisle. They looked under each seat and behind a stack of suitcases. A woman in a yellow scarf asked what they had lost. Then she pointed at the floor near the restroom door. Two paper tickets lay under a folded newspaper.

Tobias picked them up with shaking hands. This time, he tucked them inside his zipped backpack. A minute later, the conductor walked in. "Tickets, please," he called. Tobias handed them over, and the conductor punched two neat holes.

At noon, the train pulled into the small station at Pine Hollow. Grandmother waved from the platform. Ines ran into her arms first. "Tobias took care of everything," Ines said. Tobias decided not to mention the ten worried minutes. Still, he would never forget the lesson. Things are easy to lose when you are in a hurry.
