Press a Flower, Keep a Summer

Do you want to save a bit of summer to enjoy in winter? You can press flowers at home with things you already have. Pressed flowers keep their color for years. You can use them to decorate cards, bookmarks and picture frames.

First, choose your flowers. Flat flowers such as pansies, violets and daisies work best. Thick flowers like roses are harder to press because they hold a lot of water. Pick your flowers in the late morning, after the dew has dried. Wet petals can turn brown or grow mold.

Next, prepare your press. Open a heavy book near the middle. Lay a sheet of plain paper on one page. Paper towels or coffee filters also work well. Never put flowers right on the pages, because the moisture can stain the book.

Then arrange the flowers. Place each flower face down on the paper. Leave a little space between them so they do not stick together. Cover the flowers with a second sheet of paper and gently close the book.

After that, add weight. Stack two or three more books on top. Put the stack somewhere dry where no one will bump it.

Finally, be patient. Leave the flowers alone for two to three weeks. Opening the book too early can tear the petals. When the flowers feel dry and papery, lift them out carefully with tweezers.

Ask an adult before you pick flowers from a garden or a park. Some places do not allow picking. With a little care, you will have a bright collection to enjoy all year.
