The Oak and the Bamboo

On a hillside above a river stood a tall oak tree. Its trunk was thick, and its branches spread wide. Beside it grew a slim stalk of bamboo that swayed whenever the wind blew.

The oak liked to talk about its strength. "Look at me," it said one morning. "No breeze can move me. You bend every time a sparrow lands on you. Don't you wish you were strong like me?"

The bamboo only rustled its narrow leaves. "I bend," it said, "but I do not break."

The oak laughed. "Bending is for the weak," it said.

That autumn, a great storm rolled in from the sea. Rain poured down, and the wind howled across the hillside for a whole night. The bamboo bowed low, almost touching the ground. It swayed back and forth with each gust, and the wind slid past it.

The oak refused to bend. It held its branches stiff and straight against the storm. The wind pushed harder and harder. Near dawn, there was a loud crack. One of the oak's biggest branches split and crashed to the ground.

When the sun rose, the hillside was quiet. The bamboo slowly lifted itself until it stood straight again. Not one of its leaves was torn.

The oak looked at its broken branch for a long time. "I thought standing stiff made me strong," it said quietly. "Now I see that you were strong in a different way."

The bamboo did not boast. "The storm was hard for both of us," it said kindly. "Next spring, your new leaves will grow."

From that day on, the oak never laughed at the bamboo again.
